Conversation guide for pig adopters

- Do your local zoning regulations allow pet pigs?
  - NO
  - Are you prepared to adopt more than one pig? Pigs are natural herd animals and can become depressed and destructive without companionship.
  - NO
  - Are you prepared to care for your pigs for 15 to 20 years?
    - NO
    - Do you have a caregiver available in case of illness or vacation? Very few boarding facilities accept pigs.
      - NO
      - Do you have a housecall veterinarian available or are you willing to transport 100-pound-plus pigs to a veterinarian who specializes in pigs?
        - NO
        - Do you have a secure outdoor space for two or more pigs to graze, root, sunbathe and socialize for at least four to six hours a day?
          - NO
          - Are you prepared to supervise pigs and children together at all times? Pigs may attempt to become dominant over small children or smell food on children's hands and mistakenly bite them.
            - NO
            - Are you willing to introduce pigs? Pigs wrestle to establish dominance when first introduced.
              - NO
              - Do you already own a pig?
                - NO
                - Are you already own a pig?
                  - NO
                  - Are you prepared to adopt more than one pig? Pigs are natural herd animals and can become depressed and destructive without companionship.
                    - NO
                    - Are you prepared to care for your pigs for 15 to 20 years?
                      - NO
                      - Do your local zoning regulations allow pet pigs?
                        - NO
                        - Are you prepared to adopt more than one pig? Pigs are natural herd animals and can become depressed and destructive without companionship.
                          - NO
                          - Are you prepared to care for your pigs for 15 to 20 years?
                            - NO
                            - Do you have children?
                              - NO
                              - Do you have other pets?
                                - NO
                                - Consider adopting a pig!
                                  - NO
                                  - Are you willing to introduce pigs? Pigs wrestle to establish dominance when first introduced.
                                    - NO
                                    - Do you already own a pig?
                                      - NO
                                      - Are you already own a pig?
                                        - NO
                                        - Are you prepared to adopt more than one pig? Pigs are natural herd animals and can become depressed and destructive without companionship.
                                          - NO
                                          - Are you prepared to care for your pigs for 15 to 20 years?
                                            - NO
                                            - Do you have a caregiver available in case of illness or vacation? Very few boarding facilities accept pigs.
                                              - NO
                                              - Do you have a housecall veterinarian available or are you willing to transport 100-pound-plus pigs to a veterinarian who specializes in pigs?
                                                - NO
                                                - Do you have a secure outdoor space for two or more pigs to graze, root, sunbathe and socialize for at least four to six hours a day?
                                                  - NO
                                                  - Are you prepared to supervise pigs and children together at all times? Pigs may attempt to become dominant over small children or smell food on children's hands and mistakenly bite them.
                                                    - NO
                                                    - Are you prepared to supervise pigs and pets together at all times? Some pets don't make good companions for pigs; for example, dogs are natural predators and pigs are natural prey.
                                                      - NO
                                                      - Consider adopting a pig!